WEEKLY USA GRAIN AND PROTEIN REPORT January 27, 2024

Soybeans and soymeal had down weeks this week as US wheat prices moved higher and corn did nothing.

The word in most trade reports this week is that ever increasing world production levels for grains and oilseeds are weighing very heavily on the market. We are about to see very, very large soybean production levels for soybeans from Argentina and Brazil --- perhaps not quite as high as originally forecasted but still very significant production,

Corn production in the USA looks to be very good for 2024 – unless the weather takes a bad turn as can happen but so far, we are looking at a good corn crop. Argentina too is looking at a very good corn year in 2024 with increased planting. Soil moisture levels in Argentina are said to be very good. USA weather forecasts look to increased rainfall in the net few days which will hopefully offset some of the drought conditions seen in the corn/soybean areas.

Soybean/soymeal prices slipped lower on the week as everything was looking great for the crops in South America. USA soybeans are going to have to fight hard for every ton of export business in 2024. Of course, much of what happens with soybeans/meal in 2024 depends on what happens in China --- with reductions in China's pig herd, as seen at close to 6%, 2024 demand could be seriously affected.

US wheat prices were a little lower on Friday, but up on the week, as US prices reacted to softer prices in other corners of the world. Argentina getting the OK for wheat to China also added a little to the weakness as there were concerns to the effect of US wheat exports to China. Experts seem to feel that US wheat prices could continue lower into February.

Estimated Bulk Grain Freight in USD per m/t, basis heavy grains.

All corn coproducts prices were steady this week even as protein prices like soymeal moved a little lower. Trade reports suggest that we could see some price weakness next week, especially if soymeal prices remain weak.

Export prices were all steady although continued strength in container freight rates is pushing CNF destination prices higher every week. The continuing problems with container freight do not look like they will get any easier in the short term so buyers are expected to be looking at CNF prices moving higher while FOB prices could be lower.

SECTION 2 --- FISHMEAL COMMENTS AND PRICES: PERUVIAN "INDICATION" FISHMEAL PRICES:

All is quiet in Peru with fishing having come to an end and unsold stock levels very low. Trade reports these days seem to be spending most of the time talking about the El Nino situation over the next few months. Really not a huge amount of concern over El Nino as all reports lean toward a vet moderate event as a possibility.

Trade reports do say that Peru prices for the last remaining supply are moving a little higher. Super prime and Prime fishmeal prices are still very high due largely to a total lack of any supply. At the lower end of the quality standards there is a little weakness in the market but with so little to sell no one expects lower prices before next season.

After this season's lack of high quality fishmeal, China buyers will probably pile into next season and book as much prime quality as produces are willing to sell which is expected to keep prices for good grades of fishmeal quite strong. MSI Ceres mentioned in this week's report that spread between prime and standard fishmeal reached a record level of $600 m/t in 2023, up from a more normal level of $200 m/t.

MSI Ceres also noted this week how non-Peru fishmeal supply to China was up by about 314,000 m/t due to a lack of supply from Peru --- Vietnam, Indian, Mexico, USA and Thailand showed large increases in fishmeal supply. These producers will be fighting hard to maintain the export levels to China in 2024 --- it is going to be a very competitive year.
